Motivation

- Realistic movements of characters in animated movies and games are essential to make them convincing.
- Creating realistic animations usually involves using motion capture systems (Vicon) and recording behaviors of real people and animals.
- This is usually time consuming and expensive.
- Also the type of motions that can be generated are limited to the data that is recorded which can limit the freedom of the artist while developing games and movies.